Not illustrated. 1915 Excerpt: .and is probably less than that involved in the direct measurement of the oxygen consumption with its attendant temperature and barometric measurements at the beginning and end of the period. In our research we desired not only to determine the character of the katabolism, but also, if possible, to determine the minimum basal metabolism. Since this was usually determinable only in 30-minute periods, the method of computation just outlined was applied to these experiments. It should be said that the proper thermometer, barometer, psychrometer, spirometer, and meter readings were recorded at the end of every period. Calculations based upon these showed for the most part good agreement in each period between the heat indirectly calculated from the carbondioxide output and the average respiratory quotient and that calculated from the oxygen consumption and the average respiratory quotient. This fact has been cited in discussing the maximum heat-output (see table 18, p.113). Nevertheless, as each absolute value for the oxygen determination may possibly be subject to the errors previously cited, the values for the heat-output in this publication, except in table 18, have been calculated from the carlxin-dioxide determinations, using the calorific value of carbon dioxide corresponding to the average respiratory quotient for the entire sojourn inside the chamber. CARE OF THE NEW-BORN INFANT. The general routine followed at the Boston Lying-in Hospital for the care of infants during and after delivery is as follows: The infant is delivered in the case room of the hospital. This room...
