Not illustrated. 1847 Excerpt: . . . of the attendance of the inferior clergy in parliament: and it appears from the Annals of Burton--sub. ann. 1255--that the whole body of the clergy sat by representatives in the 39th of Henry III. History supplies other examples, and none of them are mentioned by the writers of the time as a novelty: a strong presumption, certainly, that the practice of representation was not altogether unknown long before the end of Henry the Thirds reign. If the representation of counties before the close of the third Henrys reign be involved in doubt, that of cities and boroughs may be considered more questionable, though supported by the authority of some eminent names. It is true that in the Saxon times the towns were often places of considerable strength and importance, and that London in particular had a great share in the politics of that troubled age. From Doomsday book it appears that...
